SPORT & RACE / ETHNICITY

The European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA) reveals racism, xenophobia and anti-semitism blight sport.

"Sport is far from fulfilling its potential when valuing diversity and social inclusion" (FRA).

racism, ethnic discrimination and social exclusion, leveraging its inclusive potential.

Equality is a core value of the EU including your right to fair treatment, your beliefs, and how you chose to live.

Good practice exists, but we must do more, including building and leading coalitions against racism in sport, including local authorities, sports federation, clubs, athletes, coaches, referees, supporters minority groups, NGOs and media.

A zero-tolerance approach is needed in sport to combat racism issues.

Using sustainable development and human rights approaches, educators can equip people to address racial and ethnic inequalities in sport.

and leadership.

Combatting racism needs more than anti-racism rhetoric. Active intervention is needed at the individual, organisational and societal level.

Tackling racism and discrimination in sport calls for legislation, monitoring, awareness, diversity management, barriers assessment and a public stance against racism and related intolerances.
